We believe there is plenty of room for charter schools in this country, and also plenty of pressure from public and private entities to provide services to low-income students in ways they cannot through public school infrastructure. Yet the consensus among experts is that charters do not replace public schools, that they are not substitutes for conventional public schools, but rather play a complementary role to the public schools. We believe that to be true as well. When we advocate a policy of expanding charters in the United States, we are talking primarily about what could be termed “non-stressed” charters. It is well known that sugar and lipids stimulate appetite and obesity. However, the mechanisms responsible for this stimulatory effect are unclear. We carried out a literature review to clarify these mechanisms. The reviewed papers were from the literature search in Web of Science, Pubmed, Scopus and Medline. We found that the metabolism of these stimuli requires the activity of gastrointestinal hormones, neural pathways and neuropeptides and these are influenced by a combination of factors including gene expression, epigenetics, neural activity, diet, exercise, and body weight. We found that these stimulatory effects appear to be regulated by the forebrain, hindbrain, brainstem and the hypothalamus. The key regulators are the mesolimb
