The present invention relates generally to a method for the purification of aluminum and alumina from Bayer process aqueous sodium aluminate solutions. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method for the removal of aluminum from a Bayer process aluminate solution by precipitating aluminum in combination with bicarbonate ions and recovering an aluminum and bicarbonate rich aqueous solution from the precipitation process. Bayer process alumina is conventionally produced in a multistage process which can include the digestion of bauxite with water to yield an aqueous solution of sodium aluminate, reaction of the aqueous solution with gaseous hydrogen chloride to yield a gaseous stream comprising a mixture of mainly aluminum chloride and hydrogen chloride, stripping of the aluminum chloride to remove the aluminum, recovering the free aluminum by electrodeposition, and calcination of the recovered aluminum to form aluminum oxide, i.e., alumina. The aqueous solution of sodium aluminate obtained from the digestion of bauxite generally contains in addition to the main constituents comprising aluminum trihydrate, aluminum sulfate and sodium aluminate, a number of impurities comprising various impurities which include iron, manganese, magnesium, sodium and potassium, among others, also in the form of crystalline hydrated oxides. It is also noted that the impurities and the crystalline hydrated oxides tend to be maintained in solution in the Bayer process aluminate solution at
