Cytogenetics in Human Immunodeficiency Virus-Related Burkitt's Lymphoma: Sex, Intratumoral CD79a Expression, and LOH of 11q Region. Many extra-nodal forms of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma (NHL) are associated with human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) infection. Burkitt's lymphoma is a common extranodal form of lymphoma in the setting of HIV infection. This tumor is characterized by an unusual chromosome translocation involving the immunoglobulin locus which results in juxtaposition of Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) and c-myc oncogenes. The presence of EBV antibodies is of limited value in predicting the diagnosis of Burkitt's lymphoma in endemic areas. We present two cases of HIV-positive Burkitt's lymphoma in which karyotype analysis has been performed, and translocation involving the c-myc and EBV gene was demonstrated by in situ hybridization techniques. The cases demonstrated sex chromosome non-disjunction in only one instance, and in a remarkably stable karyotype where there was no loss of heterozygosity (LOH) in chromosome 11. CD79a expression was consistently high, unlike the more common B-CLL. These observations serve to further define the cytogenetic features of Burkitt's lymphoma in the pathogenesis of which the interaction between the EBV oncogene and the c-myc gene plays a critical role. The prognostic significance of CT scan findings in patients with chronic renal failure. The prognostic significance of various computed tomography (CT) scan findings was evaluated in 103 patients with a history of chronic renal failure (CRF). Overall mortality within 2 years of CT scan was 46.7%. Of the variables considered, the following findings were associated with a higher risk of death: renal scarring, renal parenchymal calcification, ascites, or pleural effusion; and low-density consolidation
