Q: Regular Expression for integer in javascript not behaving the way I expect I'm not familiar with RegEx, but I'm trying to use it to validate some input. I have the following: var re = /^\d+$/; if(re.test(frm.custName.value)){ showElement("ok"); } else { showElement("error"); } Here, custName is a form control in a table, and it's of type . I'd like to make sure that it can only have one digit of my desired format: "1-9". This code isn't behaving as I'd expect. It seems to be allowing any string at all, even spaces, to be entered. The showElement() function simply shows an alert. How can I correct the code? A: Why not use a regular expression? function function checkInputValidity(input) { var pattern = /^\d+$/;

    if (pattern.test(input)) {
        showElement("ok");
    } else {
        showElement("error");

Here's a brief discussion about regexes vs. string matches: (Newser) – David Letterman got his 15 minutes of fame, but it was way more than that to Richard Milhous Nixon. As the Wall Street Journal reports, the president's $100,000-a-year "modest" salary turned a New Yorker into a stalker, as this "obsessed" letter-writer sent him 14 letters, plus 250 postcards, notes, and mementos, including a fake rubber snake, a "joke" pillow, an eraser, and a slingshot. After a 1971 visit to a Columbia University frat party, the father of three demanded that his son Marlin be removed from the Ivy League institution, thanks to a mysterious phone call; Richard told the college he was a high-ranking government official. After Nixon won the 1972 election—by just 437,000 votes, the Journal reports—the stalker visited the president's office and continued to pester him. In 1976 he even brought Template engineering for photodimerization of ribonuclease-L: properties and applications. Photodimerization of nucleic acids is an attractive strategy for the development of novel biomaterials. Ribonuclease-L (RNase-L, E.C.3.1.4.25) with an endonuclease activity is a type III interferon-inducible ribonuclease that digests and degrades RNA, and its activity is strictly dependent on the ribonucleoside triphosphates. We have engineered RNase-L with a photoresponsive azobenzene at a specific site by combinatorial site-directed mutagenesis. The UV irradiation of the engineered RNase-L in the presence of a specific substrate results in the photodimerization of the RNase-L and consequently, the photo-inhibition of its endonuclease activity. The engineered RNase-L can be used to regulate the release of caspase-3 from mitochondria and apoptosis at the cellular level. It can also be used as a substrate for the photo-FRET assay for monitoring the dimerization of RNase-L under biologically relevant conditions. This approach can be extended for the template engineering of other enzymes, which produce photo-responsive products. We also demonstrate the photodimerization of an RNase-L mutant, which has no detectable enzymatic activity, and observe that the photo-inhibition of the enzymatic activity is accompanied by the inactivation of the protein.: The theme of sudden violent death that pervades this play would create a unique horror film. memory density or cost is a limiting factor. This is in contrast to dynamic memories or dynamic read only memories (DROs), which can be modified, for example, by writing data to memory
