This process occurs in everyday social interactions, when one is getting something from another, and in social interactions that are not as pleasant, such as in a family argument or a discussion about a political issue. It also occurs in more formal interactions with other people, such as a teacher and a student or in a case where one person is pleading with another to do something. The use of speech is known as a communicative act and is considered to be an example of intersubjectivity. Communicative acts are often accompanied by a communicative act of non-speech, such as a nod of the head or a simple facial gesture. This type of communication is known as 6d1f23a050
